REASONS FOR SCHOOL DROPOUT

Reasons for school dropout at student and family level:

- Financial difficulties.
- Educational model provided by parents.
- Educational model offered by siblings is more influential. In families where older siblings have given up education earlier, their younger siblings tend to replicate their model.
- Family disorganization triggers financial difficulties. Divorce, alcoholism, domestic violence are signs that often precede school dropout decision.
- Involvement in barely legal activities.
- Entering the job market.
- Low confidence in education is proving to be a rather refuted stereotype, actually.
- Circular migration doesn't seem to be a risk factor in itself, but there are important reintegration issues in the case of children of migrants who leave the system and then return at an older age. The same problems are found in the case of older students who enter the education system.

At community level, dropout factors are:

- Early marriage model acts as a factor that prevents further education, especially in rural communities.
- The appearance of a child tends to be a community feature rather than an individual act. Beyond the fact they come from poor, dysfunctional families, girls usually follow examples of predecessors in the community where they live.
- Lack of security in the area. There are communities where, due to the high crime rate, teachers are afraid to interact with parents and this lack of cooperation contributes to increased risk of school dropout.

Ceasing education after the eighth grade model. This rule was found in one community, relatively well connected to the city, where the eighth grade graduates avoid further education in high school, often arguing absence of colleagues to continue their studies. At school level, the causes that determine dropout may be due to recurrent failure, insufficient integration of students in the class or weak relationship with the other students and teachers. There are very few actions to prevent early school leaving at school level. Teachers can play an important role in preventing early school dropout, because they are constantly in contact with the students, they can identify and diagnose their problems and can attract the attention of authorities or competent non-governmental organizations to intervene if necessary.
